Harding Will Send Communication to Committee Chairmen Expounding Views

By CLINTON W. GILBERT Staff Correspondent Evening Public Ledge

oppright, 1922, by Public Ledger Company Washington, Feb. 14.-President Harding today declared himself against payment of the soldier bonus through bond issue. He is also unalterably opposed to the special taxes, including a return to the excess-profits tax, by which it has been proposed to raise money for adjusted compensation.

This practically kills the bonus for this session, unless Congress should adopt the sales inx, for the White House view seems to leave the way open to the adoption of the sales tax. But the tarm bloe alone will kill the sales tax. and it is probable that the aroused business sentiment against the bonus will probably oppose the sales tax.

Mr. Harding will communicate his views upon the benus in the form of a letter to the chairmen of the House and Senate committees which are conferring upon the bonus. His position is just what it has been right along. He is for the bonus if metns of paying it can be provided which will not cause a disturbance of business canditions, He is pledged to a bonus, but not at this particular time.

Since his entrance into the White House he has a large sense of his responsibilities, and of the difficulties of reconciling the bonus with the task of restoring business stability. He probably regrets his pledge made in the primaries, but considers himself as bound

Every maneuver of the last few days Wayne, among Congressmen has been driected to putting the blane for the death of the bonus bill where it will do the least harm to those who come up for re-election next fall.

In this maneuvering considerable feeling developed between the White House and Congress. defeat or postponement of the bonus.

They felt that the President does not come up for re-election and that he is stronger and more popular than they are. A postponement of the bonus at his suggestion, similar to that which resulted last year from his appearance before the Senate, would probably cost the party less votes than the failure of Congress to enact a bonus bill or than the passage of one which would arouse the taxpayers or bondhoblers.

Harding Still Favors Bonus

Mr. Harding, however, has not cn-joyed the task of assuming the re-sponsibility which should belong to His position all along has been perfectly consistent, namely, that he favors a bonus when means can be found of raising the money to pay one The question of means has been one for Congress to decide

He has opposed all suggestions of tills which would seem to make pro-vision for the soldiers, but which would not raise the money, such as plans to pay the soldiers out of interest from foreign Governments, which interest those Governments are not paying and are not likely to pay for many years, or from the sale of bonds for which there is no market.
